The Defense Housing Division was founded in 1941 and would eventually build eight temporary buildings, although many became long-term housing after the war[11]. One of the most unusual U.S. social housing initiatives was the development of subsidized middle-class housing during the New Deal (1940Â42) under the auspices of the Mutual Ownership Defense Housing Division of the Federal Works Agency under the leadership of Colonel Lawrence Westbrook. His assassination instigated another wave of riots and in response, and not more than a week after the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr., Congress passed the Fair Housing Act which outlawed discrimination in housing[38]. However, since the Fair Housing Act was passed, housing policies restricting minority housing to segregated neighbourhoods are still hotly debated due to the vague language used in the Fair Housing Act. HUD could then provide subsidies to bridge the gap between the cost of these units and a certain percentage of a household's income [11]. The Housing Act of 1961 silently introduced a programme under 23 which allowed the local authorities for the housing building to host the individuals in their waiting lists in units privately rented through the mechanism of a voucher that covered the gap between the contribution ability of the family and the market fee. Other studies have been less negative in their assessments of living conditions in public housing units, highlighting only marginal differences caused by public housing units [42]. The Studigo and Reingold study (2007) concluded that, of a large list of possible health effects, public accommodation seemed to affect only on the levels of domestic violence, with a mixed effect, on the general state of health of the mother and on the probability that Mothers become overweight [42]. Criminality is also an important problem in public construction, with investigations that show a large number of drug -related crimes and shootings [40]. The potential causes include inefficient management, which leads problematic residents to remain in the unit, and the inadequacy of the police and security [40]. Public accommodations are much more susceptible to murders compared to similar neighborhoods, which Griffiths and Tita (2009) support both an effect of social isolation. Title II of the law established the objective of "a decent house in a decent environment for each American", and the law authorized mortgage guarantees for 13 billion dollars, 1.5 billion dollars for the redevelopment of the slums, e set a construction objective of 810,000 units of public accommodation. [11] At the passage of him, Truman said to the press: "[This law] opens the prospect of decent houses in a healthy environment for low -income families who now live in the squalor of the slums. The good accommodation good on tenants covered the gap between 25% of the income of a family and the rent of a fair market. ^ Jacobs, Jane (1961). Ellen, and Colin C. [27] Massey and Kanaiaupuni (1993) describes three sources of poverty, the reinforcement of the models of poverty through the position of public housing units and the migration of impoverishing individuals Public housing, although this effect is relatively small compared to other sources. [27] A study on public construction in Columbus, in Ohio, discovered that popular construction has different effects on the concentrated poverty than the white poverty than the white poverty. [28] The effect of Public Housing on the concentrated povert was doubled for blacks compared to whites. [28] The study also discovered that public construction tends to concentrate those who fight more economically in a specific area, further increasing the levels of [28] A different study, conducted by Freeman (2003) at national level, has questioned the theory that public housing units have an independent effect on the concentration of the poverty. [29] The study discovered it while non-poor people and migrants from the poor have been associated with the introduction of statistical controls, which suggests that migration levels were caused by the characteristics of the neighborhood itself rather than by the unit public housing[29]. Poverty unit concentrate public housing has an impact on economy the surrounding area, in competition with middle-class housing[30]. Due to social disorders incubated by public housing, Husock (2003) states that unit prices in surrounding buildings decrease, reducing city revenues from property taxes and by discouraging the most paying firms¹ from locating themselves in the area[30]. He also argues that pathologies caused by a concentration of poverty they risk spreading to the surrounding neighborhoods, forcing local residents and businesses to relocate[30]. Freeman and Botein (2002) are more¹ skeptical of a reduction in the value of real estate as a result of public housing construction[31]. In a meta-analysis of empirical studies, he expected that when public dwellings are free of intrusive architecture and their residents are similar to those already in the neighborhood, property values are not likely to fluctuate[31]. However, an examination of the literature did not lead to definitive conclusions on the impact of public housing on the value of buildings, and only two studies did not reveal any methodological flaws that had conflicting results or showed no impact[31]. Others are skeptical that poverty concentrated due to public housing is the cause of social disorders, arguing that this characterization is a simplification of a much more complex set of social phenomena¹[32].
